We recommended that when FHA releases new products or makes significant changes to existing products, it consider similar steps to limit the initial availability of these products. FHA officials agreed that they could, under certain circumstances, envision piloting or limiting the ways in which a new product would be available, but pointed to the practical limitations of doing so. For example, FHA officials told us that administering the Home Equity Conversion Mortgage pilot program was difficult because of the challenges of equitably selecting a limited number of lenders and borrowers. FHA generally offers products on a national basis and, if they did not, specific regions of the county or lenders might question why they were not able to receive the same benefit. FHA officials told us they have conducted pilot programs when Congress has authorized them, but they questioned the circumstances under which pilot programs were needed, and also said that they lacked sufficient resources to appropriately manage a pilot. However, if FHA does not limit the availability of new or changed products, the agency runs the risk of facing higher claims from products whose risks may not be well understood. HUDs legislative proposal would represent a significant change to the FHA Has Not agency's single-family mortgage insurance program and presents new risk Implemented management challenges. In our November 2005 report examining FHAs actions to manage the new risks associated with the growing proportion of Sufficient Standards loans with down-payment assistance, we found that the agency did not and Controls to implement sufficient standards and controls to manage the risks posed by 11 these loans. Manage Risks Associated with the Growing Proportion of Loans...
